The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for the securing of a rope against the centrifugal effects of a relatively high speed rotation.

More particularly the present invention involves the application of a flexible band or harness around the rope to both anchor the rope to a stationary portion of the apparatus and also to dampen the movement of the rope relative to the stationary portion of the apparatus. Apparatus which are particularly suitable for the marking of tires may be subject to severe mechanical shocks and strains while they are in operation. For example, in tire marking apparatus which employ an auger, the auger is forced into the tire during its rotation. Often such machinery is utilized on industrial equipment that is movable or attached to a movable apparatus so that the machinery can be moved to other apparatus without the necessity of stopping the entire apparatus. One example of a movable apparatus in which there is a great amount of mechanical work to be done is in the field of tire marking equipment. Other apparatus, such as a conveyor belt, may be subject to the racking of a loaded conveyor belt. Such racking of a belt occurs because the belt does not have a flexible band around it. The belt may be subjected to very high breaking forces and the movement of the belt is not dampened by the
